Curatorial Statement

Before we explore how borders as demarcating lines on maps shape the way people perceive the concept of territory, let's first try to understand the concept of "borders" as a kind of space: within this space separating the inside and the outside, internal systems constituted of social exchange, power, and hierarchy are noticeably different from that of the external world. These systems form the foundation from which the national consciousness of a people stems. However, when we attempt to navigate the world's increasingly complex situations from a geopolitical perspective, it is easy to overlook a fact—borders are not (only) demarcating lines that divide the internal and external space but form a space itself: what a border region reveals is not a geographically transitional area between two states or regions; instead, it is the result of two states or regions being continuously influenced by the identity of and differentiation by other communities and political entities.

Rajnish Chhanesh's work falls into the category of contemporary miniature painting. Due to the expansion of the Mughal Empire in the 16th century, miniature painting has evolved into a new style that continues to develop until today. The artist also draws inspiration from the ongoing conflicts between the Muslim and the Hindu communities. Tapas Roy was born on a refugee boat that sailed the river channels between India and Bangladesh during the Bangladesh Liberation War (1971). Through his painting, the artist delineates the memory of sounds heard in his mother's womb during the war.

Although globalization paints the picture of a utopian dream that transcends borders, we still need to be cautious when unraveling how Europocentric and non-Europocentric visions created by imperialism and colonialism have influenced the global migration of labor force and migrants, which has been driven by transnational enterprises competing for productivity and interregional industrial chains shaped by the policies different nations. Throughout the process of decolonization, these visions have crumbled and proliferated into countless borders inflicted by tumults and chaos, contemporary South Asia being an example in this case. Furthermore, during this process, the spaces demarcated by these borders have been legally recognized. Together with other ambiguous sites still in the legal gray zone, they have gradually replaced our previous understanding of the so-called border regions.

Tsering Motup Siddho uses the porcelain bowls commonly found in the traditional Ladakh culture as a starting point. This type of porcelain bowl had crossed borders and was introduced to Ladakh through Sikkim and Nepal. However, in recent years, products mass-produced by foreign factories have increasingly replaced these porcelain bowls. Through his work, the artist explores the activities of trade that take place on the borders while discussing the impact of India partially closing the borders regions.

The blurriness and fluidity of borders also make them a perfect dwelling place for historical shadows. Like the entanglement between Taiwan and the phantom of R.O.C., the division produced by the McMahon Line – the creation of which is joined by the R.O.C in 1913 – is still a factor that influences the Sino-Indian border dispute as well as how certain groups are viewed as "refugees" or "overseas citizens" in Taiwan.

Drung is a Tibetan filmmakers collective founded by Tenzin Tsetan Choklay, a Tibetan in exile who has returned to India from the US after the pandemic, together with other Tibetan filmmakers in exile, including Tenzin Kalden and Sonam Tseten. Through projects such as the "Filmmaking Mentorship Program," they endeavor to preserve stories that have taken place during exile. Tsai Yung-Ching is a documentary filmmaker and human rights activist, who fought for her Tibetan spouse's right of residence in Taiwan. This film was made before Taiwan revised the law concerning the situation of Tsai's husband, which specifies that Tibetan individuals in exile who are spouses of Taiwanese citizens shall be viewed as foreign spouses; and related Taiwanese laws are thereby applicable to them. Documenting a filmmaking workshop created for Tibetan students in exile, this film was made during the artist and her husband's short stays in and continual travels between Taiwan and India. The script, written by the students themselves, recounts various issues in the community of Tibetans in exile, such as unemployment, drinking, and stealing across borders into Western countries. Thirteen years later, more than half of the students who participated in the making of this film have joined the global migrant population to seek a better future in Europe.

Shifting our attention to life in local places, it seems that the influence of borders shaped by gender and hierarchy is ubiquitous and manifests itself in ineffable and uncomfortable details. Vichar K Achaar is a female art group from India. Their Mahila Zine is a long-term and ongoing publication project in collaboration with different female artists. Before each issue goes to print, the preliminary processes of discussion, illustration, and writing for the zine provide women living in conservative Indian society and patriarchal families with a space to breathe.

This exhibition might not be able to provide new solutions for coexistence in relation to the shadowy border regions. However, it signifies an endeavor to offer fresh insights into the formation and expansion of borders, the transborder transaction, and the discomfort lurking in border regions, thus serving as a reference for finding ways of coexisting with the shadow.

Note:

In 1949, the Kuomintang (Nationalist Party of China) was defeated by the Chinese Communist Party in the Chinese Civil War and retreated to Taiwan, where it continued its administration as the government of the Republic of China (R.O.C.). This has caused the "Two Chinas" problem, with the other China being the People's Republic of China, which was founded by the Chinese Communist Party.

TSAI Yung-Ching

Bio

TSAI Yung-Ching (b. 1976). She started engaging in theatre, film and documentary production in 2001 and has worked as a photographer, editor, and multimedia image designer. During this period, she also participated in the film production for Macau City Fringe Festival for three consecutive years. In 2005, she began a field survey about the Tibetan diaspora due to a film project. She investigated how modern lifestyle had impacted the Tibetans in exile after they left Tibet, as well as various social issues resulting from illegal immigration, interracial marriage, and lack of work opportunities. Three years later, she began making a documentary film about the current social situation of the Tibetans in exile, entitled The Way Home, and met her current Tibetan spouse Lhundup Tsering during the process.

After they got married in India, her husband could not obtain Taiwan's resident certificate due to his identity as a Tibetan in exile. The family was therefore forced to stay in India for six months while applying for travel documents for entering Taiwan in early 2011. During this period, the White Tara Cultural Foundation in the Tibetan community in India invited Tsai to organize a two-month image workshop for a group of students.

With her husband repeatedly denied entry into Taiwan and the family forced to live apart, Tsai began fighting for the right of residence and naturalization of Tibetan spouses in Taiwan after the birth of their eldest child. In 2017, Tibetan spouses could finally apply for residence and naturalization like other foreign spouses. Tsai currently lives in Hualien and has been working on the production of The Way Home. She is also a frequent speaker in talks and events featuring issues related to the stateless people and their rights.

Tapas Roy

Tapas Roy was born in the Sundarban Delta region of Bangladesh in the year of 1971. It was during the time of war, genocide, and ethnic cleansing by the authoritarian army of Pakistan along with local religious radicals. Millions of the minority Hindu community were butchered, and several other millions were driven out of their homes. Like thousands of other families, his family also fled to India in a small wooden fishing boat. It is an area that consists of several rivers and their tributaries networked like veins and capillaries, and naturally many families took the water routes to find safe places and save their lives. Roads were unsafe as there was fierce fighting in the land and all escape routes were blocked with tanks and machine guns. The waters became red and his family had to pass through floating mutilated bodies amidst mayhem and fear. At the year-end, after a gory battle, the Eastern part of Bengal got freedom and a new country—Bangladesh was born. It was during his family's journey back home when he was born.

Since unborn and being in his mother's womb, Roy has witnessed the shadow and horror of war in the form of sound (whirring warplanes, guns, and the like), visuals through narratives, and later on visuals through photography and other media. He would still wake up at midnight from nightmares of dragon bomber planes whirring and flying like monsters. Later on, when he was grown up enough, he witnessed blood thirst and hatred in the eyes of people. The war was over, but it took several years for lives to recover from famine and numerous other side effects, engraving aside an everlasting impression on human minds and souls. The memories of voice from his mother's womb are the roots of most of his works.

The more things change, the more they stay the same

Tsering Motup

Written by Tsering Motup and Abeer Gupta

Located at a trans-Himalayan frontier of the Indian subcontinent, Ladakh operated for centuries at an intersection of the Central Asian and Himalayan trade networks. Since the mid 20th century, with the establishment of contemporary nation-states, the region has undergone several dramatic changes. The militarization of its borders as well as rearrangement of trade relations within neo-liberal economies has had considerable impacts on its local culture. Once a contact zone of various streams of cultural production and a formidable center of pan-Asian as well as internal trade, Ladakh wielded control over major commodities. Today, Ladakh stands subsumed by production and circulation networks of India.

Like many fractures in post-colonial lives and practices, the artefacts on display function at multiple planes. They first embody a value accrued by generational aspirations of fine Chinese porcelain. Once an artefact afforded only by the elite, familiar industrial reproductions were prized commodity for the middle classes. Once obtained only via fervent changing of hands, their production has now expanded to unfamiliar territories. The handle-less teacup common across the Himalayas persist in its form, the motif and colors have evolved parallel to affordable technologies of reproduction.

The ceramics in Tsering Motup's kitchen in Nimoo village home comprise various sizes and designs, ranging from the blue and white dragon to eight auspicious symbols and many more. His interest in these objects began since those special pieces made their appearance only when they hosted their special guests; otherwise, they stood still inside the glass shelves, displaying themselves and waiting to be dusted once or twice a year. However, he felt that these objects were alive in themselves, performing their duty by affecting them and their sense of culture by remaining inside. Thus, he began to question how they arrived in their kitchen or, in other words, whether they were once a local craft and what their relevance to the locals was, and why they have become such important objects within every Ladakhi household.

His mother also used to tell him that the special objects in their house came from Dumtsele, through informal trade in the winter with Tibetans at the border with China, formerly Tibet. When his uncle was posted at the border as a soldier, they would buy many of these objects from the locals at a much cheaper price than the market price, so he would bring some for his mother as gifts when he returned home on holidays. He believed that, since these objects hold a special place as souvenirs, they remained within the shelves for more than 25 years, and that the aesthetics of these objects do not match with the current ones available in the local market. Furthermore, the trade at the border has stopped since 2015, and now similar objects come from Sikkim and Nepal via New Delhi at a much higher rate for which one would have to pay. However, objects like teacups and bowls have played a prominent role in Ladakhi culture, regardless of whether they were made by local craftsmen or even if they do not have any ties to that craft in Ladakhi culture. It has fostered cross-border cultural ties among South Asian countries nevertheless.

The Boy Tashi
SAI Yung Ching

TSAI Yung Ching's husband is a Tibetan in exile living in India, and she is a documentary producer that came to India to document the situation of the Tibetan diaspora. They met, fell in love, and got married because of their work, but her husband was not able to obtain permanent residency in Taiwan due to his identity as a Tibetan in exile. In February 2011, Tsai and her husband were forced to leave for India because his travel documents that allowed him to stay in Taiwan had expired. After returning to Dharamsala, the White Tara Cultural Foundation invited her to organize an image workshop for fifteen students from the Sarah College for Higher Tibetan Studies. During the two-month workshop, she lived with the students, working and experiencing life together.

For the students, it was a strange and abstract idea to tell stories through image. Tsai first started by engaging them in group discussion and moved on to having them creating stories, performing, using cameras, and sharing ideas they had in minds in a concrete manner. Through intensive learning and solid practice, they reached the goal step by step and finished a short film and a play after two months. The short film The Boy Tashi stems from the students' observation of adults' collective anxiety and the pressure children experience in the Tibetan community in India. The observation is turned into a story told through various snippets of a child's growth in a tone that is neither too heavy nor too lighthearted.

TSAI Yung Ching's husband is a Tibetan in exile. In 2011, because his travel papers expired, the couple had to return to India. During the time of living in Dharamsala, the White Tara Cultural Foundation invited Tsai to organize a film workshop for fifteen students during the summer vacation. The workshop lasted two months. Telling stories through film was a strange and abstract concept for the students. They began with exercises of group discussions about how to create stories and perform, about exploring forms and using different mediums as aids, and about how ideas could be realized in a concrete manner. After an intensive period of time and solid efforts, the work was gradually formed.

During the two months, they produced a short film and a play. The play, Five Minutes, uses the story of a Tibetan girl before her exile to tell the agonizing collective experience of the community in exile, along with the expectations and hopes that emerge throughout the process. While watching the play, two generations of Tibetans—those who have left Tibet and those that were born in a foreign land—also engage in a dialogue that explores their inherent differences.

Blind Witness

Rajnish Chhanesh

2023

Written by Aditi Ghildiyal

Across his new series titled Blind Witness, artist Rajnish Chhanesh takes on the role of a visual archivist illustrating the idiosyncrasies and fallacies of human society. These immensely intricate paintings retain his signature style of entwining contemporariness with traditional miniature paintings, but with a fresh take. Here the artist departs from his quintessential personal narrative and explores a more broadened political voice, embracing human history, mythology, and collective consciousness.

In his landscapes, devoid of human presence, nature takes the center stage and serves as the catalyst for unfolding the narrative. The lyrical compositions visually guide our eyes effortlessly across the purview of each painting, making us take note of every nuance Rajnish has inculcated with fineness. Taking inspiration from a Hindu myth about the ancient Vedic deity Indra, who due to a curse ended up with a thousand eyes on his body, the artist presents the viewer with a multitude of eyes in the sky, water, birds, and in the form of peeking alligators. These eyes stand for the common people who witness injustices in their daily lives and are hopeless about redress. It was intentional for the artist not to illustrate a mouth anywhere to symbolize the voicelessness of masses in the socio-political landscape.

This series marks a drastic shift conceptually in Rajnish's oeuvre as earlier his focus was essentially personal, intimate, and self-introspective. His recent works revolve around the idea of Samay, Samaj and Vyavastha (Time, Society and System), a trio that, according to the artist, shapes the common man's reality as well as consciousness. The three agencies influence each other simultaneously making an impenetrable loop of cause and effect. His works provide a thoughtful critique of the political, economic, and social systems, pushing the viewer to engage intellectually and question the simulated rut we are trapped in so that one day we might cease to be blind witnesses.

Mahila Zine

Vichar K Achaar

2018—

Mahila is a word borrowed from the Hindi language and in English can be translated as woman, lady or adult female human. But when spoken in the context of Indian society, the word mahila may take on a number of connotations depending on the particular social construct; the essential denotation may however remain the same, i.e., female human. It is also a word that is used in public across the country especially to denote the category of females. Seats assigned for women on a DTC/ government buses or Metro train in Delhi are labelled as Mahilaon ke liye; women queue up at the gates assigned for Mahila for security checks at airports; public women's restrooms also have the Mahila sign.

The Artists' Notes

We are not oblivious to the sarcasm and the blind standardization that come along with the conventional usage of the word; in fact, it is this discontentment that leaves a lot of room for satire, humor, and exaggeration. We took our inspiration from this milieu of hidden meanings apart from the referential implication and chose to name the zine Mahila. The name was preferred as it is neither too generic nor too specific.

The zine is a space where we can articulate our experiences stretching from private and personal to social and conceptual. These stories are told with a witty, tongue-in-cheek approach, but not necessarily in a roll-on-the-floor-laughing way. We feel this name fits the collection of our visual narratives, which are women oriented and created by women artists. The stories range from at times drawing and analyzing the 'everyday', to observing the altering roles of women in the urban milieu (from domestic to professional, sexual to social, emotional to economical), reflecting upon individual experiences and opinions of/as women, to shouting out for gender equality and exploring the intersectional connecting us through gender, class, and race.

Our politics

As a feminist platform, we believe in gender equality and operate in the domains of socialist realism. We refuse to be categorized under any other feminist definitions, as there are many including cultural feminism that weakens our argument in the real world. No Wiccans pleeez...

Mahila Zine makes an effort to create a sustainable dialogue by women/females at times about being a 'woman' and/or about everything else, working with a new theme in its every issue. There have been eight issues to date sharing experiences about health, motherhood, body, food, space, Covid confinement, and personal diaries. These micro narratives primarily visual in nature are welcome in the form sequential art, comics, artworks, visual narratives, visual poetry, posters, photo essays, and poetry.

Operations

We are a not-for-profit collective self-publishing platform and share with the participating artists whatever/whenever funds we receive through any agency after deducting our printing costs of the zine. Mahila Zine does not charge any fee from anyone and purely relies on image sharing basis. We do not ask for original works for the zine; the copyright of the artwork remains with the artist. We owe the existence of Mahila Zine to the women artists who have worked with us over the past six years and the organizations or people that have supported us through our previous eight issues.
